''It's not too hard to sell Virginia'' to industrialists, Godwin explained. But their concern is the training of industrial research scientists.

''People that are trained for mechanical work can be retrained in a few months, or a few years,'' he said. ''In the field of higher education, the need is correspondingly great.''

Godwin said that in the regular session of the general assembly in January ''you will find a well thought out'' program for vocational and technical training throughout the state.

Godwin listed many state institutions where a ''foundation for such training'' already exists. In addition, he cited the increase of community colleges throughout Virginia. ''Better jobs and better pay will increase tax revenues,'' he said.

''It's because of the intensified effort'' by Governor Harrison, he said, that Virginia has only 2.5 per cent of its people unemployed, the lowest rate of unemployment in the nation.

Education For What

''It is not enough to have the knowledge to build an atomic bomb,'' Godwin said, ''it is even more important for men to use their wisdom and judgment rightly''. We are in a world that ''demands excellence of knowledge and character.'' And character cannot be bought. It cannot be taught.''

Character is made of ''making the right small decisions'' and building on those in making the right ''large decisions.'' ''I like to think that in America we have a great appreciation of that'', he said.

Godwin praised Virginia teachers who ''through the years have sacrificed to impart to children great verities and truths.'' He paid tribute to the veterans, saying, ''so much has been given to because some have made great sacrifice'', and that ''through great effort we have been able to come this great hour'' in history.

The lieutenant governor told the Legionnaires nowhere else in the world is education so widely offered as in America.

''Here, where universal education is practiced,'' he said, ''it has lifted our standard of living to heights incomprehensible to most of the people of the world.''

He pointed out Americans are the recipients of a bright life due principally to education. ''It has lifted us, as a people, from the darkness and has contributed to a better life for us all.''
